The Autumn Allegory. The red leaves rustle in the autumn sir,

The corn-sheaves bound are in the autumn The swallow turns him from our furrows bare To seek the sweets the richer Southland

Dear is the lesson of the rustling leaf, Of furrows bare and harvests gathered in; Dear is the thought to man's astumnal grief

That issues from the passing floral kin. A brighter flame than ever rosebush wore Burns on the forehead of my ardent hope; On lighter wing than ever bird upbore

My trust is borne beyond the other's scope. Far statelier than the elm in summer time Was he, the friend that withered like the

More vital than the germ where lurks the coming prima Was that high soul whereto my own soul cleaver. Not half so fair as she whose smile I miss Was any plant with all its blossoms on, Nor can I find in all the sweet abyes

A life so centered as the one withdrawn, Fly southward, swallow, on thy pinions gray, And tell the South of warm hearts beating here: And when again ye hear the voice of May Return to glory in the wakened year.

-Brooklyn Eagle.

A bootblack, seeming ready to burst into tears every moment, was seated in the sun at the postoffice, and a good hearted lawyer chucked him under the chin and asked it his regular fall season for chills had arrived. "I kinder feel like having chills, and I kinder feel sad in my thoughts." was the reply. "Any of the folks sick?" "Not as I know of." "Perhaps the sight of falling leaves and other evidences of the dying year affect you," observed have ever brought to this market. All bought the lawyer. "Mebbe they does, and mebbe it's for cash, and will be sold at down prices. Call 'cause I lent a boy ten cents Saturday night.'
"But won't he pay it back?" "I dunno. He went out hunning Sunday, and I've got a feelin' that he went to shoot at a crow, and the crow flew, and the gur went off, and the muzzle kicked around, and the breech flew up. and all the shot hit Dick in the stummix. If he got shot, there'il be so much 'citement, and crying, and burying, and taking on, that no one will think to ask me if he owed me ten cents !" "Will this relieve your mind?" asked the lawyer, as he passed over a dime. "Wwell, not quite, sir, but it'll sort o' reconcile me to takin' more chances on Dick's hittin' the crow instead o' hisself."-Detroit Free Press.
